The Werewolf-XL database contains simultaneous high-quality individual and panoramic (group) recordings of 30 experiment sessions with nine participants per session; it covered 129 participants in the age range of 18–29 years. The data-base had a total of 987 h of audio-visual recordings of group interactions while playing a conversational RPG called Werewolf.

We provide 133,461 individual utterance-level video clips annotated with self-assessment reports of the real internal emotional states using 18 non-prototypical emotional categories from all the subjects and the external emotional states in terms of pleasure, arousal, and dominance, including 14,635 samples from speaking players.

We provided an extensive benchmark by comparing handcrafted and deep neural network features for unimodal emotion analysis. In addition, decision fusion of concatenating the estimates from different unimodalities yielded improved multimodal performances
